1. The Research Programme

In the first year we programmed a series of internal seminars to: 1) define the key procedures and to implement literature review routines; 2) to establish an interdisciplinary consensus about key concepts and 3) to define the steps to develop appropriate data collection tools as well as refine some aspects of the research design. It was expected that these activities would allow us to meet the priorities concerning fieldwork:

- Achieving consensus about the concept of legitimacy and that of institutional trust, as well as about the means to operationalize both;
- Identifying and finding solutions for methodological challenges such as, those related to longitudinal studies (panel contamination, attrition, interval between data collection to be able to discern changes, role of experiences over life time vs. recent ones);
- Statistical treatment of longitudinal and cohorts data;
- Aspects of data collection, for instance, question wording (measuring trust);
- Selection of interactions to observe/develop a rough pattern of citizens-civil servants contacts;
- Identify which services are more often contacted by citizens- to inform the design of data collection tools.

The weekly seminar have focussed on the theoretical and methodological challenges presented by the programme and occasionally covered related themes by guest scholars (a full list of the seminars is attached, see Appendix 2, Item 2.2. Internal Seminars). The reading activities have been quite tasking due to the volume of books and papers on the key themes identified as priorities for reading, in particular on the issues of political trust, and trust in public institutions, mostly referring to the criminal justice system. The seminars have also covered methodological issues such as innovations in data collection, the challenges of longitudinal and cohort studies, the challenges in collecting data on transgressions (non-compliance with laws) and the statistical treatment of the data.

The preparations for fieldwork took place in three areas simultaneously: a) the development of data collection tools, b) identification of key areas of the city where the data will be collected, and c) the collection of key information about the public services that will be covered by the fieldwork.

A. DATA COLLECTION TOOLS

The development and pre-test of data collection tools: quantitative and qualitative

The literature review that had two goals: 1) to identify consensus in the definition of the key constructs, the variables used to measure, key questions that have been raised and challenges, and 2) to secure that our interdisciplinary team is exposed to what is taking place in a diverse field\(^1\). This review was to inform about the state of the art and allow us to refine the design of fieldwork as well as to help us develop data collection tools\(^2\).

Our research programme is fairly ambitious and complex. We wanted to secure that the concepts we are exploring are well defined and that they are correctly operationalised. We are also aware that this will demand combination of methods as will need to combine qualitative and exploratory tools with quantitative ones. Our research assumes that:

> Civil servants are the gatekeepers within the institutions that implement the laws: when they interact with citizens they are exercising authority, implementing rules and regulations, and de facto defining if and how people will exercise rights, as well as duties. Citizens have expectations about how they will perform, moreover that they will be fair, just and impartial. Thus citizens judge the manner civil servants exercise authority and this in turn affects their decision to cooperate and to obey the laws and regulations\(^3\).

\(^1\) The researchers and students at the Center for the Study of Violence come from diverse fields: Social Sciences, Law, Psychology, History, Mathematics, Literature, and Public Administration. Not all of them are familiar with the literature about democracy, legitimacy, trust, compliance with law, rights and so forth. To secure that we speaking the same language two groups of activities others were organized: a division of the literature review among the full research staff, and weekly seminars on key papers, books and documents to inform the detailing of the field work and data collection.

\(^2\) This review also involve methodological issues such as that of longitudinal studies applied to such themes and statistical treatment of longitudinal data.

\(^3\) As stated in our research programme: "We are assuming that, in the regions of Sao Paulo selected for the study, residents will have had a history of contacts of various degrees and intensity with local authorities. In this process they will have accumulated perceptions and evaluations of the authorities’ performance and on that basis will have built up differing levels of trust. We are thus seconding what Tyler (2011:257) says about such encounters: "From a legitimacy perspective, every encounter that the public have with the police, the courts and the law should be treated as a socializing experience that builds or undermines
We therefore propose to analyze how the legitimacy of key institutions for democracy is constructed, or jeopardized, by exploring the contacts between citizens and civil servants. Our research programme will be limited to local institutions: the local municipal administration, the local school, health center, labor courts, police services, and local justice centers.”

As result we expect to answer questions such as:

- how can there be social trust and institutional trust and moreover compliance with the law and/or willingness to obey the laws in a context of accumulated inequalities?
- in how far low levels of social trust relate to low institutional trust, to explore the reciprocal relationship between democracy and social trust,
- how does lack of social and institutional trust foster the perception that rights and protections are not universal goods and thus relate to poor support for universal access to human rights?

This is to be studied from the perspective of both citizens and civil servants and will pay close attention to how innovative legislation and programmes are implemented by public officials. The study takes the form of a longitudinal panel with multiple contacts over a period of time this is complemented by a study with early adolescents to follow up how respect and compliance for laws evolve (the early socialization process) by some case studies, by observations of interactions between civil servants and citizens and by some ethnographies.

The review had to cover a wide breadth of topics: legitimacy (state, political, political parties, criminal justice-police, judiciary), institutional trust (political trust, generalised trust, social trust, service delivery and trust), youth (authority, compliance with laws, legal socialisation, collecting data from youth) and methods (measuring trust/confidence, longitudinal studies, statistical treatment of longitudinal data, new methods to collect data, cohort studies). It covered areas fields such as political science, public administration, governance, human rights, social psychology, criminology and law.

The review indicates that at present, the concept “legitimacy” still lacks consensus and though there is a greater number of studies on trust and on institutional trust than on legitimacy and on compliance with laws, consensus is also scarce about what is institutional trust. This diversity is reflected on how these concepts are measured and in how far research results can be compared.\(^4\) Research on “good governance” (Rothstein, 2005) indicates that each contact is a ‘teachable moment’ in which people learn about the law and legal authorities”.

\(^4\) Research on legitimacy, when related to democracy refers to political institutions (political parties, elections, parliaments, governments, etc.) consists of the analysis of secondary data originating from cross-2008; 2009) local administration and service delivery and trust (Van de Walle & Bouckaert, 2003; Van de Walle & Six, 2013; Van de Walle, Roosbroek, & Bouckaert; 2008) is very incipient as well. The field in which legitimacy has been more consistently researched (using a framework that allows for comparisons) is that of the criminal justice: in particular the police and the judiciary, with few studies on the prison system. In this area Tyler’s (2006; 2010; 2011; 2013a; 2013b; 2014) contributions about the role that procedural justice plays on trust and legitimacy dominates.

Primary research was found to be more frequent in studies focussing on legitimacy and institutional trust in the criminal justice system, as well as in the few studies focussing on the delivery of specific public services. Some research on institutional trust, that seek to establish the roots of trust examining the roles of culture and that of institutions, also rely on primary data. Compliance with the laws is more often found in studies that assess the how trust in institutions, in charge of enforcing legislation, effects compliance. Examples tend to involve specific regulatory legislation on environmental issues (forestry, fishing quotas) or land use, in sum that effects specific groups in society.

Though we concentrated on articles, and restricted the period to the last five years, some books and reports also had to be included, given their relevance. Eight hundred and eight seven (887) papers were retrieved and screened to establish priority for reading. A total of 346 titles (between papers, books and reports) were read and summarized by members of the research team. All summaries were shared with the research staff. Papers found to be more important were selected to be read and discussed by all. A number of books were selected for weekly in-house seminars (a full list of the seminars is attached, see Appendix 2, Item 2.2. Internal Seminars).

Not only do the concepts of legitimacy and institutional trust lack consensus but also the relations between the two: sectional surveys carried out over time, in various countries using standard instruments that allow comparisons and monitoring over extensive periods. These tend to use data from surveys such as: the World Values Surveys, Eurobarometer, Americanbarometer, Afrobarometer, Asiabarometer, Middle Eastbarometer and the European Social Survey. Generally such data is complemented by data from Freedom House, International Transparency (data on corruption) or data on the quality of governance from the World Bank.

5 A number that keeps growing as new alerts are received every week.
• legitimacy may be an element for trust – a synonymous of trust in procedures and actions (Kwak et al., 2012);
• may rely “on the perception of citizens”, be multidimensional concept and trust be one aspect of this issue (Doyle, 2011);
• some equal legitimacy to loyalty (Gibson, 2003) while “perceived legitimacy as: judgments that the institution has and uses their power rightly and justly” (Pytlíčkova et al., 2012), and
• “partly a psychological state of consent with authorisation involving a belief that the law and justice officials are to be complied and cooperated with” (Tyler, 2006a, 2006b).

More recently a paper by Bottoms and Tankebe (2013) reiterated the need for researchers to incorporate the contributions political science, in particular these of Bettham (1991) and Coicaud (2002) to the study of legitimacy in the field of Criminal Justice. This contribution was added to other advances taking place in the field leadered by Jackson et al. (2011) resulting in that in a number of recent studies empirical legitimacy is being conceptualized as having three sub-components – obligation to obey, legality and moral alignment (Jackson et al., 2013). Bottoms and Tankebe (2012) also explored the contributions of Weber (1999) and those of Raz (2009) about how power holders actually obtain and maintain legitimacy to exercise power: the need that power holders would have “to cultivate legitimacy”. Implicit in this need is the demand that some how powerholders must interact with their audiences/publics or clients. The consequence for research is that: “legitimacy needs to be perceived as always dialogic and relational in character” (Bottoms and Tankebe, 2012:129). This means that:

That is to say, those in power (or seeking power) in a given context make a claim to be the legitimate ruler(s); then members of the audience respond to this claim; the powerholder might adjust the nature of the claim in light of the audience’s response; and this process repeats itself. It follows that legitimacy should not be viewed as a single transaction; it is more like a perpetual discussion, in which the content of powerholders’ later claims will be affected by the nature of the audience response. In what follows, we shall often return to this iterative process of claim and response. (Bottoms and Tankebe, 2012:129)

This contribution by Bottoms and Tankebe instigated Tyler and Jackson (2013) to explore the connections between the developments in their on theoretical advances on the role of legitimacy. These developments (Tyler and Jackson, 2014) can be seen in a recent National Survey in the USA in which they explored the relation between legitimacy and compliance with laws disentangling “obligation to obey”, “trust and confidence” and “normative alignment.” The concept of legitimacy as a motivating force for people to comply with the law was operationalized as “(1) people’s authorization of legal authority to dictate appropriate behaviour and (2) people’s trust and confidence that legal authorities are honest and act in ways that have citizens’ best interests at heart” (Tyler & Jackson, 2014: 78). Thus legitimacy was broadened to include a dimension that motivates “not compliance but cooperation with legal authorities, with people in the community viewed as working together voluntarily to coproduce social order” (Tyler & Jackson, 2014: 78). A very important element to this effect is to determine if people “willingly embrace cooperation with the police and the courts” (Tyler & Jackson, 2014: 78).

Legitimacy thus involves trust and confidence, but not only: legitimacy should also foster the engagement of citizens in their community and as result “through this enhance social, political, and economic development in those communities” (Tyler & Jackson, 2014: 79).

When operationalising this concept of legitimacy new forms of measurement were introduced:

Perceived obligations and trust and confidence are values linked to acceptance of the directives of authorities, for example, they are reactive. Yet, cooperation and engagement also involve self initiated proactive behaviors. An important recent extension of the conceptualization of legitimacy, which is more clearly linked to motivating proactive behaviour is identification with the police based upon shared purposes, values, and goals. (Tyler & Jackson, 2014: 79)

Contributions from Jackson et al. (2011) were also include and these refer a moral alignment:

The publics’ belief that the police’s sense of goals and purposes and values align with their own. Jackson and colleagues have argued that this sense of normative alignment leads people in that community not only to believe that the power of authorities is normatively justified, but also to identify with legal authorities and thus cooperate. (Tyler & Jackson, 2014: 79)

The evidence from this research confirmed the adequacy of expanding the concept of legitimacy as well as the effects attributed to legitimacy in relation to the police and the courts in the USA. The experience led the authors to make the following recommendation:
Legitimacy is about people’s perception and reception of power and authority. Importantly, this power and authority emanates primarily from the social roles and institutions. In the words of Hawdon (2008: p. 186): “The role is legitimate; the individual is trusted.” For example, police legitimacy is a belief about the right of the police as a group to possess authority and the police as individuals to exercise discretionary power and influence (as opposed to an instrumental belief that individual officers turn up quickly in emergencies or can control crime). We would recommend that measures of legitimacy focus on the authority that the institution (the role) confers onto individual officers and, conversely, the validity that actions of individual officers confer back to the institution and role (an appropriate sense of legality, lawfulness and the embodiment of values). (Tyler & Jackson, 2014: 90)

The recent developments in the field are being analysed by the research team in order for us to incorporate what is deemed to be more appropriate to our context. It is clear though that the effort of critically reviewing such contributions can only improve the refinement of the design and implementation of our programme. This review has also led us to decide to contact the key researchers identified and to start explore possibilities for collaboration and exchanges.

As already suggested literature review also corroborated our initial assessment that the relations between institutional trust, legitimacy and social trust again are far from clear: the direction of causality is still being debated, as is the role that trust plays in the development and maintenance of legitimacy. Still there is growing cross-cultural evidence tending to support the hypothesis that generalized trust increases social trust and that generalized trust is effected by institutional trust as well as to show that both cultural and institutional dimensions effect trust. The literature on service delivery is less abundant but this review is still in progress.

Three papers are in progress based on this review: one on legitimacy, a second one on institutional trust and a third one service delivery, compliance with laws and good governance.

Refrining the Design

To refine the design we found we needed more information about patterns of interactions between citizens and civil servants (types of services that people more often search, frequency, types of questions that elicit more comments about the nature of the interactions and so forth). To do that we retrieved data from two qualitative research, carried out in the mid 1990’s that had some evidence on citizens’ contacts with some public services, and some data on how they perceive the laws. We retrieved this data to identify contents related to the present programme. It was important to identify:

- The actual contact they had with the local and state administrations;
- How they described such contacts;
- Whether third parties’ experiences with the services were mentioned;
- The language used to report such contacts;
- The salience that public services had on people’s lives;
- Compliance with the laws;
- Image of politicians and political parties (political trust);
- Question wordings that could be explored in the pre-pilot study.

Contacts with the police were the most frequently mentioned (spontaneously) by respondents in the two researches followed by the judiciary, the health sector, education, social services and local administration. The interviews provide a clear distinction between institutions and civil servants: in general, the image of civil servants is more negative than that of the institutions and this is true for most institutions- education, health, police, social welfare, pension system.

There was one surprising exception - the judiciary: here the image of the institution in very negative while that of judges is generally positive. One of our objectives was to identify whether we would be able to collect information about citizens’ contacts with public services with an interval of 12 months. This exercise reassured us about this: not only people report direct experiences but also those of relatives, friends, neighbours and colleagues at work. This solves one problem but also evokes another: methodologically how are we to separate the effects of experiences third parties have had with public institutions from the respondents own?

The interviews transcripts revealed patterns of contacts between the public and the authorities in particular the police and this combined with input from the ongoing literature review led us to elaborate a number questions about the nature of relations between citizens and the police and to explore their impact on trust. Our concern is also with ensuring some international comparison can be drawn as well as to try selected a number of questions about actual contacts with the police, and tried them with a sample of respondents in São Paulo we designed a survey to test the usefulness of some tools to explore.

6 Consisting of 220 interviews (roughly 450 hours of interviews transcribed) with residents in very diverse areas of the metropolitan region, public opinion makers and members of the criminal justice system.

This led us to carry out survey in São Paulo to explore recent contacts people had with the police and if and how such contacts effected their trust in the police. Twelve percent (12%) answered they had initiated contact with the police (called the police or gone to a police precinct) and 15.5% had been stopped by the police (while walking, riding a motorcycle or driving a car). These numbers vary according to the age of the respondent with youth (16 to 24 years) being more often stopped by the police –representing 30% of those stopped by the police, while having initiated contact with the police by a similar percentage to other age groups (14%). There was one surprise: in three districts (with very high homicide rates), though the patterns of contact with the police, for both age groups, were similar to those of the city - younger respondents also more often stopped by the police, still 24%, or almost 1 in 4, of those who initiated contact with the police are in the age group 16 to 24 years. This cautions us about the need to suspend biases about how certain interactions take place: the prevailing image of the relations between the police and youth as being solely marked by negative experiences needs to be nuanced for other types of interaction appear to take place. Analysis in course are allowing us refine question wording to assess this type of contact.

B. Key Areas

The Definition of key areas for the study

The objective of this selection were twofold: 1) to ensure that the different patterns of urban consolidation in terms of the differential access to urban infra-structure would be

7 This is not very different from what was found in the USA. In 2008 17% of citizens over 16 years of age had face to face contact with the police, according to the Police-Public Contact Survey (PPCS) a supplement of the National Crime Victimization Survey carried out by the Bureau of Justice Statistics. Christine Eith and Matthew R. Durose (2011) Contacts Between Police and the Public, 2008. NCJ 234599 represent in the sample and 2) to reduce the costs of intensive data collection by limiting the areas to be covered while securing representativeness. The different patterns of urban consolidation were expected to express differences in the degree, intensity and or frequency of contacts with public services and public institutions. Areas that were more recently occupied should present greater need for public investment, and their residents present more demands from public institutions. The key areas should allow us to capture different types of contacts between citizens and civil servants and possibly, differing degrees of satisfaction and effect trust in the services and in the institution.

Eight key areas were identified after an extensive exercise of secondary data collection and treatment. Data from the Census Bureau (1980, 1991, 2000 and 2010) provided information about the population, housing conditions and infrastructure for all the census tracts in the city. Emplasa – the Metropolitan Planning Agency provided information about the expansion of the urban area and about the areas under legislation to protect water sources. Data on transportation across the city was obtained from the “São Paulo Metro Origen and Destination Study” for 2007, data on areas that present geological risks (landslides) from the Municipality of São Paulo and data on violence (homicides) from the State Secretariat of Public Security.

The integration of the data from the different sources, using different territorial divisions was a key challenge for the identification of the key areas for the study. Different sources disaggregate their data according to different territorial divisions, this is the case of the Metro, Emplasa and the Secretariat for Public Security. Still this was not the single obstacle as the Census Bureau re-divided the city at least three times over the 30 years. This resulted in the growth of census tracts from 8,116 in (1980) to 18,953 (in 2010). Converting the information from different territorial divisions to that of the census tracts was the solution as tracts are smaller areas, but was rather cumbersome. After the data were standardised by the census tracts, two statistical analysis were carried out: time series factor analysis and cluster analysis (hierarchical and K-means) to secure intra group similarity and inter group differences. The results revealed eight key areas made up of census tracts that are very similar within the area but different from the other areas. The following variables were used:

- Environmental conditions: presence of geological risks, located in a water source protection area.
• Housing conditions: subnormal housing (favela), demographic density, permanent housing, precarious housing, data of urban expansion-period in which the area was first occupied, vertical expansion- proportion of apartments in relation to houses.

• Infrastructure: houses connected to the water supply system, houses connected to the sewerage collection system, houses with refuse collection.

• Urban mobility: number of daily trips and time spent in daily trips.

• Crime data: homicide.

• Population profile: total number of residents, proportion of male youth (10 -19) in relation to total residents, proportion of female headed households, proportion of heads of household that can read, and proportion of heads of household with higher earnings (over 20 minimum wages a month).

Next the eight cluster selected were visited and photographed. These photographs were used with a panel of naïve students: the task was to match the photographs to a set of attributes. This process of validation worked quite well with naïve judges results’ agreeing with the statistical results well above chance.

The methodology developed to define the key areas for the study resulting in two papers for publication one on the process to standardise territories and one on the overall methodology to define areas for such study.

C. Public Services Information

Collecting key information about the public services

Following with the original work plans our undergraduate students have been collecting information about key services in the city of São Paulo: statistics, legal framework, existing research on the topics, linking the results from the theoretical seminars to the data they are collecting. They are building up the contextual information against which we will carry out our analysis and helping us identify demands for case studies and behavioural observations. The services include: schools, health centers, police precincts, local municipal headquarters (subprefeituras), Conselhos Tutelares, Centros Integrados de Cidadania CICs), Poupatempos, - amongst others.

WORKSHOPS WITH PARTNER INSTITUTIONS AND PAPERS

Originally we scheduled an internal workshop with partner institutions, the International Advisory Committee, plus post Ph.D. fellows and Ph.D students from Mexico, Ecuador, USA, South Africa and India, for the first semester of 2013. This Workshop was to focus on the process of selecting key areas for study and members of CEM were to be invited to participate in the definition of Study Areas. We suggested that Visiting Ph.D students and fellows would arrive one month ahead of the workshop to work with NEV USP team on specific issues and prepare joint papers. Six joint papers were to be produced as result of this workshop.

Due to the delay in formalization of the contracts with Fapesp, we kept the schedule of the Workshop with our partners to explore alternatives for comparative work. This workshop was quite successful in identifying possible lines for consistent comparisons the key issue that remained was how to secure funds for work by our partners. We also scheduled another workshop with post-doctoral fellows and Ph.D. students from our partner institutions: they were to meet in São Paulo to work with our post Ph.D. researchers on the theme: Youth and “new forms of violence”. This workshop is now in course.

A third workshop with our partners was scheduled to take place early this year in Cape Town but was cancelled after we realized that Fapesp’ resources cannot be used to fund our partners to meet abroad. This was transferred to São Paulo next September (2014).

PUBLICATIONS

The following papers are being prepared:

- Selection of the Key Areas for Study
- Application of longitudinal methodology in contexts such as São Paulo
- Study of socialization of laws, norms and regulations by youth
- Review on legitimacy
- Review about institutional trust
- Service delivery and compliance with laws
As we were detailing a post graduate course format, it occurred to us that we were reproducing what is traditionally done at the University and this led us to consider that there was a gap between the concept of a research innovation Center and a traditional education programme. We decided to investigate how key universities in developed economies are handling the challenge of post-graduate degrees in the Social Sciences. Dr. Leticia Godinho an expert in Public Administration carried out this exploratory study for us at:

- L’ENA – École Nationale’Administración Publique
- Sciences Politiques at the Universities of Lille and Strasbourg
- Université Paris 1 (Panthéon-Sorbonne): at the School of Economic, Human, Legal and Political Sciences
- University of Cambridge: the Institute of Criminology
- University of Bristol: the Human Rights Implementation Centre
- King's College: at the King’s Brazil Institute
- University of Oxford: Blavatnik School of Government

The results of this initial study fully corroborate our hunch that we need to explore new means to train post-graduate students, but not only, that we will have to experiment with new technologies (in the broader sense) to intervene in other levels of education as well.

We are still searching for means to develop the concept of a Center to Debate Democracy, Human Rights and Violence.
3. Knowledge Transfer

Considering our efforts over the past twenty years, our initial assessment is that, despite the variety and intensity of efforts to improve respect for democratic rule of law and for greater access to human rights, reducing violence in the society⁸ some key challenges remain. We decided to evaluate in detail the knowledge transfer efforts over the past 12 years in order to develop new strategies. At first glance we have done a lot but in a fragmented way, responding more to external demands than as result of a structured plan with a clear goal. Prior to an international workshop, as proposed in our original programme we decided to finish this evaluation to set a few goals and the objective of the workshop will then be to develop means to achieve these goals.

We identified all the activities in the period defined according to the type of activity: short terms courses, lectures, book series, media, academic events and non-academic (professional organizations, NGOs, civil society organizations etc.).

⁸ Lobbying for the approval of legislation and for the creation and implementation of institutions to exercise accountability, participating in the development of national and state human rights plans, fostering the creation of organizations in civil society, being very present in media debate, disseminating scientific information, developing training programs etc.
4. MAJOR OBSTACLES/SCIENTIFIC CHALLENGES

RESEARCH

Though the internal seminars have been very important to secure that researchers would come into closer contact with the literature from disciplines, other than that of their expertise, this is just the first step towards implementing inter-disciplinarity. The results are heterogeneous, not so much because of the differences due to their original fields of study, but to differences in their training in handling the literature, and even carrying out reviews. One of our challenges now is to bridge this gap between the researchers. Our weekly seminars have become a key feature to this end. We are also to start small group discussions between researchers focussing on one key paper with the goal of improving the group’s capacity to analyse papers.

The methodological issues in relation to the longitudinal study are not small. The literature review has raised a number of serious problems over issues such data attrition, of data contamination and the ensuing difficulties for statistical treatment. Problems also exist in relation to the type of questions involved (some sensitive, others very trick to measure- trust for instance), compounded with the fact that most data will be provided by the respondents and the risks of acquiescence, reticence social desirability, fear etc. We expect that ough the data from observation of interactions (civil servants-citizens) and from focus groups, will provide additional information as well identify the most sensitive areas, that which is more likely to be affected by problems with respondents. Also some secondary data from public sources (statistics on service demand and delivery, on law vioaltions etc.) can be collected to contextualize the data collected form respondents. The youth study presents other methodological challenges, but here at least working from schools we have a more diverse repertoire of pilot studies to carry out before designing the questionnaires.

KNOWLEDGE TRANSFER
Besides what was identified in our initial research programme and which still stands:

“In particular three challenges stand out:

a) the complex nature of the information produced,

b) the reluctance of some key audiences to receive the information, and

c) the urgent need for the information to help support difficult social change. Institutions such as the FrameWorks Institute in Chicago will be invited to share their experience in this field. Calls for contributors will be made through USP’s network of international universities with which the university holds formal working agreements.”

We still lack the professional support of a dedicated staff member to this issue alone. As result when we are so involved with developing the tools for data collection, treatment and analysis, there is little energy to devote to innovations in this field. Our assessment of past efforts will help us delineate (we hope) more efficient means to communicate ideas and knowledge to the broader society.

POTENTIAL PROBLEMS /BOTTLENECKS

Similarly to Knowledge Transfer we are still lacking the support of a professional with managerial skills to follow up the different activities to ensure that we can keep our schedules as closely to what was originally planned. We are examining software alternatives that will allow us to accomplish this goal without another member in the staff.

The Selection Process for Post-Doctoral Fellows

Eight Post Ph.D. fellows were to be recruited to conduct specific work plan presented with the research proposal. Such work plans are critical elements to complement the core of the research programme. The first call for post-doctoral fellows of the NEV CEPID Project was published at the NEV website on August 5th 2013. It was also present on the “Oportunidades FAPESP” webpage on July 1st, 2013, as well as sent directly to researchers, post-graduation programs and research associations and groups in several national and international universities and research networks.

The call was disseminated through:

- Post-graduated programs at Brazilian universities: 389
- International research centers: 55
- National research centers: 18
- National and Foreign Research associations: 7
- Direct contacts with foreign researchers: 64

The following institutions and organizations were contacted:

a) International partners at the University of California at Berkeley, El Colégio de Mexico, FLACSO-Ecuador, University of Cape Town, University of New Delhi, and North Carolina University;

b) Members of our the International Advisory Board at the: University of California-Santa Barbara, the Kellogg Institute at Notre Dame University, Brown University, CNRS-CESDIP and the University of Sorbonne in France);

c) Colleagues at the Social Science Research Council DSD Fellowships Board,

d) IDRC;

e) King’s College, (London);

f) Michigan University;

g) PAHO and WHO- and their Collaborating Centers – in Australia, India, USA, Canada, Sweden, UK, France, Spain, Italy, Colombia, Mexico, as well as colleagues from multicenter studies in Macedonia, Saudi Arabia, Malaysia, China and South Africa.

In Brazil with the support of Fapesp, the Instituto Brasil-Europa at the University of São Paulo-IBE and CCINT-USP and our partners at the National Institute for Science and Technology on Violence, Democracy and Citizen Security in Rio de Janeiro, Rio Grande do Sul, Brasilia and Ceará we disseminated information about the fellowships. Research groups working with similar themes present in the Research Groups Directory of the National Council for Scientific and Technological Development (CNPq) were also contacted.

Other sources were universities that have formal cooperation agreements with USP and that have expressed willingness to work together with NEV on specific points such as Queen’s University in Belfast.

Other international sources contacted were: Michel Wieviorka, at the EHESS - École des Hautes Études en Sciences Sociales, and Prof. Angelina Peralva at Université de Toulouse II.

Academic Programs and Associations were also contacted:

- The Social Science Research Council in the USA;
- The David Rockefeller Center for Latin American Studies at Harvard University;
- The Centre of Brazilian Studies at Columbia University;
- The Lemann Center of Brazilian Studies at the University of Illinois and at Stanford University.

The call for submissions was also sent to key journals:

- Democratization;
- Journal of Democracy;
- Constellations;
- Journal of Critical and Democratic Theory;
- International Social Science Journal;
- Law & Social Inquiry;
- Behavioral Sciences & the Law;
- American Behavioral Scientist;
- The Journal of Politics;
- European Journal of Criminology;
- European Journal of Social Sciences;
- Government and Opposition;
Finally key professional associations were also contacted: LASA, IPSA, ISA, AAA, SPSSI, BPS.

The eight Post Ph.D fellows to develop the following themes related to the CEPID Project: 1. Youth, laws and authority: how youth learns to respect the law. 2. Public policies and innovation. 3. The access to public information law and public services in São Paulo. 4. Innovations in criminal justice and resistance to change. 5. Violence and Urban Changes. 6. Reduction of violence, laws and the legitimacy of institutions. 7. Living with impunity: how the experience of impunity for serious victimization affects people’s trust and beliefs in law. 8. Nation State and Frontiers. The initial deadline to receive the applications was October 31st, 2013, later postponed to November 30th, 2013.

The Center received a total of 13 applications, five of them from foreign researchers. Despite the broad dissemination of the opportunities for Post-Ph.D, the applications from researchers based in Brazil, came only from the State of São Paulo. Three of the five foreign researchers were based in Germany (one of them Brazilian, one German and one Indian), the fourth came from the United States of America and the fifth from Greece. The selection committee was formed by NEV’s Coordinators Prof. Sérgio Adorno, Nancy Cardia, and by the Senior Researchers Vitor Blotta, Renato Alves, and Viviane Cubas.

Considering the overall assessment of the projects and the low number of applications, in comparison to our expectations, we decided to select only three fellows in this first process, leaving the possibility for a second round of the call in order to fill the other five positions. The chosen candidates of the first call were researcher and journalist Dr. Bruno Paes Manso, researcher and public security consultant Dr. André Zanetic, and the Greek

Assessment of the First Call and Next Steps on the Post-DOCS Recruitment Policy

The low number of applications may have been due to the demands made: full time dedication, fluency in Portuguese and English, as well as specific proposals for projects within pre-established themes of the CEPID Project. It appears that most new Ph.Ds in the Social Sciences either have, pre-established, follow-up projects, or intend to develop projects that derive from their PhDs research and are not interested in pursuing a new line of research.

In the second round of the selection process, we will try to focus more narrowly on certain institutions identified in the literature review as focussing on themes related to our research programme. We will forward the call to these Centers and in particular to key researchers for the dissemination of the call amongst their students We expect to have the new call out by August, 2014.

Recruiting Undergraduates

In the period between August 20 and September 30, 2013 a public call was made to select the undergraduate students for CEPID’s Scientific Initiation scholarships. The selection process required any applicant to send a brief curriculum vitae, university transcripts and a brief letter expressing the reasons for which they were interested in the scholarship. For the ten scholarships available we received a total of 32 applications.

A first screening of the curricula followed the following criteria: a) the semester that the candidates were enrolled in the university; b) the academic performance; and c) expectations regarding the scholarship. In this first phase, 26 applicants were selected for a personal interview.

In the second phase, the applicants were interviewed by NEV senior researchers. The selection process ended in November 2013, with the outcome listed in Table A below.

Supervision
Each student selected for the IC scholarship is responsible for developing one of the work plans proposed in the CEPID/FAPESP Project. Also each student was assigned to a supervisor, chosen among NEV researchers with a Master’s or a Ph.D. Degree. The assignment was based on the area of expertise of the Supervisor to match the specific topic of the IC project.

Table A: IC Fellows X Course X Supervisor
All IC students attend a joint general meeting monthly with the Supervisors to discuss: a) the bibliographical references, so as to establish common theoretical, conceptual and methodological foundations for the CEPID/FAPESP Project; b) the steps and research activities shared between the different IC students workplans; c) the research reports produced by the IC students.

The IC students also have meetings with their supervisors to discuss and establish specific steps of their activities to: a) define specific literature related to their research topics; b) to review secondary data collection and treatment; and c) writing research reports. The frequency of these meetings varies according with the stage of the research and the needs of the IC students, varying between weekly and fortnightly. The students also attend the Center’s general meetings on the project and seminars.

Future activities of the IC students for the second half of 2014, include secondary data collection on the public services that will be the focus of our research and preparing their first year report, as well as participating in the general meetings of the Center.
6. Objectives to be Achieved Next Year

2014-2015

Pilot Studies

Pilot studies to define data collecting tools for the longitudinal study will take place. The pilot study will involve qualitative interviews/observations to define questionnaire schedule to be used in the longitudinal study in the population living in the areas selected as well as the questionnaire schedule to be used with civil servants in the different services: schools, health centers, police precincts, local municipal headquarters (subprefeituras), Conselhos Tutelares, Centros Integrados de Cidadania CICs), Poupatempos, - amongst others.

Study with Youth – Cohorts (youth born in 2003) in public and private schools in the areas selected- with the objective to identify how youth develop trust in institutions. This pilot study will be used to define the questionnaire schedule to be used in yearly data collections. By the end of the first year all field piloting will have been completed.

The pilot studies will provide data to be used for papers refining the conceptual framework and hypothesis well as to document the different stages of the research programme.

First Semester: Monthly internal workshops shared through video conferencing with our international partners and International Advisory Board to discuss the initial field work (February, March, April, May and June). In July partners will be invited to send one fellow (post Ph.D or Ph.D student) to spend a month working on joint papers with our fellows and graduate students. (5 joint papers expected)

Second Semester: An international workshop with partners and International Advisory Board to produce a balance of results achieved so far both in terms of the theoretical as well as empirical advances. (8 joint papers are expected to result)
EDUCATION

One international seminar to take place in 2014 on new technologies applied to education for human rights, democracy and violence. Calls for contributors will be made through USP’s network of international universities with which the university holds formal working agreements.

KNOWLEDGE TRANSFER

Hold an international seminar on the challenges and opportunities for knowledge transfer in the Social Sciences.
